Excerpt: . chapter X. the steersman. After tea Marco and Forester took a walk again to see the canal. They passed across the river on the aqueduct, and came out to the canal at the chequered house again. They then followed the canal up, going from lock to lock, as it gradually ascended along the bank of the river. They stood upon the bank at one of the locks, seeing a boat go through. It was about half past six o clock, and a calm and pleasant evening. The boat was not a packet, but it had several passengers on board. There was a woman sitting upon the deck, forward, with a little child by her side. The woman was knitting. The child was playing with a little basket. Cousin Forester, said Marco, let us get aboard of that boat and go along the canal...
