While standing in this silent attitC tude, I suppose we were observed by them; for my father, immediately changing the course of his walk, joined us in the road, and, without the least embarrassment, presented to us his fair companion as the daughter of a lady whom he much respected, and should be happy to see numbered among our most intimate friends, and who, from her own peculiar merit, was deserving of our esteem. There aeeded no other recommendation; it was sufficient, to me, that 14 my father judged her a proper companion; and, the natural sociality of my temper prevailing over ceremo ny, ny, we soon became as chatty as if we had long known each other. But my aunt, who had seen more of the tc world, and had my interest much at heart, looked upon this affair in a -very different light,...
